Not illustrated. 1896 Excerpt: . . . VII. THE CHILDREN OF HEAVEN. IT fell to the prophet Zechariah to foretell affairs and events in the restored Jerusalem, which to the pious Jew was the type of the city of God. Its desolations had been great and severe. The war-horses of its enemies had pranced in its most sacred places; their hoofs had thundered on the spots where holy altars had stood, and their neighings had rung where the music of voices and instruments had celebrated the praises of Almighty God. The strong walls which had stood as ramparts of defense around the sacred city had been broken, and insolent barbarians had poured through their ragged breaches for rapine and plunder. The homes of the people had been invaded and sacked. Carnage and lust had done their worst. The surviving citizens had been carried away as captives by the armies of the conquerors, and in strange lands they had found it hard to sing the songs of Zion, and their untuned harps hung desolately upon the willows. Few and melancholy were the inhabitants of the old city that had seen proud days of joy and festivity. Aged men and women were no more seen on its streets nor ascending the mount for holy worship. There were no children within its broken and silent walls; their swift feet were not seen in play; their glad laughter--sweetest of music--was not heard, thrilling wherever it rang; the flash of roguish eyes, the magic of...
