THE FORT SNELLING RESERVATION FROM the time of the arrival of Colonel Leavenworth with a battalion of infantry in the late summer of 1819 to the establishment of the territory thirty years later, Fort Snelling was the principal point of interest on the upper Mississippi above Prairie du Chien. The American Fur Company had its chief trading post under the guns of the fort. The Indian agent had his residence and council house a short walk from the main gateway of the inclosure. There travelers and traders found their journey's end or their point of departure for further excursions. Above all, the garrison of the fort, though always small in number, was the only physical guaranty of peace and order over an immense area. Although its importance diminished after the establishment of the territorial government, events followed which may warrant the inclusion of the chapter here begun. Some reference has already been made to the delimitation in 1839 of the military reservation proper about Fort Snelling. On July 29 of that year the commissioner of the general land office notified the war department that the land would be reserved from sale. The land thus indicated was a tract roughly marked on a map transmitted by Major Joseph Plympton on March 26, 1838, in response to an order of the war department of November 17, 1837. The lines were run out in the fall of 1839 and a complete map was forwarded...
